Dysphonia is the medical term for disorders of the larynx. It can lead to troubles with talking, whispering, coughing, or laughing. It can also come from problems with the throat, teeth, mouth, or problems with the muscles of the neck. Many disorders of the larynx can be difficult to diagnose correctly because it is usually not noticed that something is wrong. This is because the larynx is located deep in the chest or lower neck, and it works by moving air in and out of the lungs. Although it is not clear exactly what causes dysphonia, it usually occurs when there is something wrong with the muscles that support the structure of the larynx. The larynx is the part of the airway (the throat) that takes in air to breathe and produces sound. A person with dysphonia will most likely have difficulty producing either sound or air when trying to talk. You may have problems with your voice because of something you ate, drank, did, or ate and drank together. You could have had a cold or the flu recently. If you become hoarse or become more hoarse after eating, drinking, or smoking, make sure to talk to your doctor. You should tell your doctor if you have any of the following: You may notice a change in the way your voice sounds. If you are having problems with your voice, speak to your doctor. She can conduct a physical examination and give you a diagnosis. You may need a laryngeal exam. The term is, quite literally, a croak or a cry. Although it literally means “withdrawal of breath,” it is colloquially more often and more often used as a term for something vocal. Dysphonia means “withdrawal of voice.” Dysphonia is not the same as voice loss. For instance, if a person’s vocal cords are damaged and the windpipe is also damaged, the person will have dysphonia and may also have vocal loss. Dysphonia is also not the same as having a problem with the nerves that carry the sound signals from the larynx down into the vocal chords and into the lungs. This usually happens as a result of nerve damage. Dysphonia is a medical condition where there is a problem with the passage of air to or from the larynx. It affects people with airway
