If you are on the wrong update, you will need to download the right one. Are you using a Mac? Download this: Q: What does "Control may be pressed on the connection of a source or destination port to an active service" mean? I am getting the following warning while trying to create a scheduled task using python on windows: Control may be pressed on the connection of a source or destination port to an active service. This is generally an indication that the operation is not permitted. Can someone explain this to me. I understand the use of "A connection from a source or destination port to an active service is a connection that is intended to be used for something." But what does "Control may be pressed on the connection of a source or destination port to an active service" mean? Also, the python documentation is not very clear in its definition of the mentioned function. Is it saying that the connection will be closed because of this? There are many system services available that will all use ports in the range 0 - 1024, and which are used for all sorts of functions: The command prompt, The console, The Windows Event log, The Event Viewer. ... etc. You are trying to run a Python script as a scheduled task. A scheduled task runs on a windows machine, so the control-may-be-pressed means that someone else is trying to access that port from a different service. The following example comes from Python's SysExit documentation (emphasis mine): The following two functions are defined to show examples of how to interact with the Scheduled Tasks control panel. Both functions assume that the scheduler is running and the user is logged in to the system. As an aside, I really don't understand why Windows makes a distinction between an interactive user and a scheduled task. I 82157476af
